Critical care rehabilitation has grown considerably in the past decade. Evidence indicates that early initiation and intensity of rehabilitation are associated with improved patient function and outcome. Although the functional outcomes achieved are variable, critical care rehabilitation has been shown to improve function, and has a positive impact on survival. In this review, we outline the basic principles for rehabilitation in the intensive care unit, including the timing of beginning and ending rehabilitation, the assessment of acute illness severity and the contribution of acute medical care on the timing of rehabilitation, the essential elements of early mobilization, and the use of noninvasive ventilation in patients recovering from acute illness. We review the principles of the long-term goals of rehabilitation in these patients, including spasticity management, functional electrical stimulation, pulmonary rehabilitation, and patient-centered goals of care. We also discuss the important elements of critical care rehabilitation for patients with chronic diseases, including cardiopulmonary diseases, musculoskeletal diseases, stroke, and neurologic disorders. Finally, we address the important issues of ICU-based and rehabilitation facility-based care. The physiologic and pathophysiologic changes associated with critical illness make rehabilitation a challenging course of care for both ICU and long-term care physicians and nurses. Critical care rehabilitation in the acute care setting should be a standard of care, and not a specialty practice.Q: scrapy JSONP is executed twice I have a problem with a scrapy crawler which uses a JSONP callback.
