Interview: How Should Developers Dive Into Immersive Technology? If virtual reality is the next big thing, then its importance is perhaps best encapsulated by other words: public awareness. We get the early stage of a technology that is still only in its childhood stage. It has been 30 years since humans were first able to walk around on another planet. This year alone, we saw a new iPhone with augmented reality. Meantime, Google, Oculus, and Facebook are all but devoted to the pursuit of creating a future reality where you can be anyone, anywhere, at any time. "The first few drivers of VR's revolutionary potential are vanity and entertainment. For VR to become more than window dressing, it has to have a significant impact on our lives and our work." - Damien Maiorana, design director for Atomic Books With an estimated minimum of $10 billion spent in 2017 on VR advertising and marketing (some estimates go as high as $100 billion), it is seemingly obvious that VR is here to stay. However, with this level of industry investment, there are worries that the "immersive tech" has overstepped the consumer market by the time we experience widespread consumer adoption. In a world that employs 7.2 billion people, we'll likely need a number of years before mass adoption occurs, and meanwhile we have other issues emerging like the potential of the 5G network to accelerate an even wider use of mobile VR. VR wasn't just a tech trend—it was a moment that changed the way we all think about our personal space, our freedom, and our various expectations about the future of the world. But we're still at the early stages of mass use, so it's time to consider how immersive tech can change the way we live and work. How can technology break down the barriers between user interface and content? Anyone who has used Facebook's Oculus Rift or Google's latest cardboard headset, inside of which there is now a small computer, remembers the incredible sense of movement you experience. The content is real—but the computing platform that makes it real is artificial. Having your own computer in your head offers a level of immersion that can't be matched by other virtual reality experiences. But how much room should companies take in digitalizing our world? Some say that companies are taking too much control of our spaces—and, sadly,
