What's new in Hot Squat 2: New Glory:

Options The European single-hull sailing dinghy, or prototype of the original J24, did not have T (trajectory) steering. The Trajectory Control system is designed to assist on better weather days or for faster dinghy designs. The Trajectory Control system is aided by radar detection of objects, such as birds, which may enter the rhumb line and pull down the wind that would otherwise be traveling on the intended course, thus requiring T steering to maintain desired course. Trajectory can also guide the steering arm to position the boat in the desired course without demanding constant steering manipulation. Position the boat too far out of the wind and T steering will bring the boat back toward the wind requiring additional steering corrections (x 10). When the boat strikes the water or rises out of the water, the T steering system will take over and continue steering (normal steering). The Trajectory Control system also protects the boat from wind off the leech (tail) during acceleration and as the boat recovers from the wind blowing from the leech. This is especially important for sailors heading directly into the wind during a tack or crossbow. When the BN3 Trajectory Control is engaged the steering arm will continue to point to the ESE direction while the boat moves from the transom. This can be set with one of several Set Trajectory Mode options such as: DETECT and STEER (default): It monitors the wind in the path of the boat. If the wind changes outside of the desired set course the boat moves to bring the wind on the desired course. STEREO (2): The boat will be steered to track the established E/W wind from two wind references. STEREO N/S (2) (The boat will be steered to track the established E/W wind from two wind references, but it will first aim the boat NE/SW before aiming northwest. This is to assist boats that follow the tacks/joins of others by arriving ahead of them after turning the first time.) It should be noted that while the Trajectory Control will help the boat stay on the desired course, it is not a substitute for good steering input from the helmsman. It cannot give directions to the helmsman. Trajectory Interlock The Trajectory Interlock System is designed to protect the sailing ding
