In a way, I could relate to the Rubber Ducky, because I had an imaginary girlfriend and we also shared a passion for green, fast cars. We don’t see a lot of them, but I remember when I was younger that you’d almost always see a couple of Rubber Ducky toys sitting on the lawn for sale at the local drugstore. The green ones would go for about 50 cents, but the white Rubber Ducks were only 75 cents. After I had gathered enough money, I’d almost always get the Rubber Duck; the one with the comic books. In the course of my life, I’ve noticed that Rubber Ducks have some interesting connections to other toys or products, but for now, here are 10 intriguing things you may not know about this toy that I found out through research. The Rubber Duck is an homage to the iconic rubber ducky swimsuit worn by Annette Funicello. The Rubber Duck was only for sale at the local drug store for a little while. According to the site that I found this information on, a local drug store owner held on to the property they held to the local toy store for 25 years, and by 2012, the store no longer existed. Rubber Ducks were originally produced by Brunswick Corporation Rubber Ducks were originally produced by Brunswick Corporation, based in Illinois. In 1964, Brunswick released the first two Rubber Ducks, as part of their new “Waterwise” line. Rubber Duck was also known as the first “Big Mouth” action figure, in that the mouth was supposed to open and close. This version of the Rubber Duck was also designed to look like a space-ship.
