Cheap uber-cool virtins multi-instrument premium pro 3.2 crack direct downloadIt sounds like a malevolent but comical plot line from a classic film: a sea serpent rampaging about the Pacific Ocean is running amok, wreaking havoc on unsuspecting yachts. But it's real. Although the discovery of a live devil fish or sea snake is rare, these bizarre creatures are not entirely new to our oceans. There's a documented case of a living sea serpent previously found off the coast of Massachusetts in 1798. But due to the limitations of the time, researchers believed this sea serpent was actually a type of wolffish. A wolffish is a small type of viper and the devil fish, in reality, is actually a type of frogfish. How rare are sea serpents? A devil fish or sea snake is typically found deep in the ocean. They've been documented as having a length of about four feet, and they lie in waters over 600 feet deep. The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration notes these creatures are "remarkably docile" and will swim around or hang from the bottom when they feel threatened. The eerie thing is that the sea serpent, according to National Geographic, is "quietly swimming around in the deep sea" and is thus missed by scientists until the creature gets caught by a fishing net. Think of a sea serpent as a cross between a salamander and a wolf. This image provided by the University of Southern California shows a live sea serpent or longnose frogfish. (AP Photo/University of Southern California) The discovery In April, a sea serpent was spotted swimming in the Pacific Ocean about 160 miles off the coast of Northern California. The creature, a longnose frogfish, was investigated by marine biologists. The large adult sea serpent was estimated to be about 30 feet long, perhaps the largest living serpentine fish. Scientists named the species Xenotes longifilum, which means "uncommon and exotic," because they found the large and unusual specimen in deep waters. The researchers knew that the fish would be active due to the freezing temperatures in the depths of the ocean, but they weren't expecting to see such

Get all controls on a page with jQuery I'm looking for a way to get all the controls on a page with jQuery. I'm checking for hidden controls that should not be displayed, so I need to get all controls, I know that I can use this to get a collection of controls $('body *'); but it will include all controls on my page, so I need a way to check whether those are visible or not. Any ideas? A: You can use the querySelectorAll() method, and specify the classname of the controls you want to include. The querySelectorAll() method returns a NodeList representing a list of the elements within the document matched by a CSS selector, which is a string of the form: [type="foo"] It's more efficient than document.querySelectorAll() because it's more succinct.
Windows Phone Mango update is ready to go! Microsoft officially
