One of the early AutoCAD Free Download users is Henry Petroski. The English-born, American architect uses AutoCAD Cracked Version at his home office and on his personal consulting projects. Petroski's drawings are featured in his new book "To Try is to Risk, On Architecture" published by Penguin USA. He tells how he "learned AutoCAD" from his cousin, Mervin Helfman, while working in his cousin's gas station. Read Henry's account of his early AutoCAD days in this interview with Popular Mechanics. Why did you decide to learn AutoCAD? I needed to do some drawings for a company I was working with. It was a little bit like auto racing, where you had to be on the spot and under pressure to get out there and meet your deadline. What was your background? I was raised in Australia, where the government had commissioned a program called We Built Australia. I remember the first thing I learned in school was that it was the government's job to design everything and build everything. The only thing that they weren't involved with was consumption. I didn't know how to make do without them. And I'm sure I'm not the only one that feels that way. Is it still true in Australia? Yes. It's why, after graduating, I ended up in Canada. I wanted to find a place where there was no government interference in design and where people knew how to do things on their own. When I first came to Canada, I worked in Montreal, where I had just finished a Master's in Architecture and Regional Planning. I had been a reader of the Architectural Review in Australia, and I'd come to Canada to see if there were any architectural schools. While I was there, I was given a subscription to the Journal of Architectural Education. I hadn't seen anything like that in Australia. While I was in Montreal, a guy named Henry Petroski came in to speak. I liked what he was saying and went to meet him. I knew that the Journal was having a conference and I asked if I could buy a subscription. He said, "Well, I'm Henry Petroski. If you like what I've been saying, you can come to the conference." So I bought a subscription, and by the time I got back to Montreal, I found out he was giving a paper. I told him I was from Australia and that I
