Using the new paper plane feature, you can superimpose an image over another, creating some interesting and useful compositions. For example, you can place a photo of a group of people on top of a landscape photo and stylize the middle image. There's even a new text tool, as well as adjustments for image width and size of window. Among the new landscape and portrait tools, you can now import a smart object, add basic fade effects, and apply a standard amount of sepia (or other filters) on a selection. It's relatively straightforward, and it makes sense, as these tools are needed for such purposes. While the new crop tool is not as effective as the previous one, some users may find it more streamlined. The new layer navigation system now offers quick access to choices like opacity and blending modes for your layers. Smart Objects contain the same level of editing options as regular layers with the exception of adjustments, which are limited to things like brightness and contrast. The final new tool -- the ability to adjust global contrast or brightness, or the equivalent of degree control, -- is a welcome addition. The ability just to set light and dark points, and see how they will look, is a very useful tool. While I have no idea if this newfound power will help me produce better-looking images, it does make working smarter and it is worth a try. For new users, Lightroom 5 only includes a few changes to the user interface. The keyboard shortcuts as implemented in the previous version remain unchanged save that the spacebar now opens a menu -- a system I am still not fond of. One small change that makes more sense is the addition of a refresh button to the "Flatten Image" button. My only real complaint with the previous release was that the flatten function in Lightroom seemed incomplete. I know this has something to do with the fact that I import photos using both Color modes, but Lightroom, even for a "flatten" function is not quite intuitive at this stage. Of course, if you have a particular need to use, say, a 1920x1200 image, you can either crop it or force Lightroom to recolor it. In any event, the previous functionality still exists. The quick adjustment panel is now a little more like the window. It feels less cluttered, and importantly, groups of adjustments you group are now easier to remove quickly.
