Haematological and biochemical profile of captive red-faced civet. Civet is an Indonesian wild cat found throughout Southeast Asia. The red-faced civet (Trinilurus macrotis) is a rare Philippine subspecies thought to be extinct. Since the early 1990s, there have been reports of the civet making its way back into the wild. However, little information is available on the civet's physiological and biochemical characteristics. In this study, we report the haematological and biochemical profile of the red-faced civet kept in captivity. In total, 11 red-faced civets from the National Zoological Garden in Bali, Indonesia, were included in this study. Serum biochemical markers, clinical chemistries, complete blood count, and packed cell volume were determined and compared with the values of healthy domestic cats ( $n = 30$ ). The red-faced civet had a lower mean packed cell volume ( $34 \pm 2.6\%$ ) compared with that of the domestic cat ( $42 \pm 1.9\%$ ). The red-faced civet had a lower hematocrit ( $33.8 \pm 4.7\%$ ) compared with that of the domestic cat ( $41.5 \pm 2.2\%$ ). The red-faced civet was found to have a higher mean albumin concentration ( $32.9 \pm 3.9$
