(Pablo Martinez Monsivais/AP) President Donald Trump signed two education-related bills on Thursday aimed at rolling back the Obama-era guidelines that were on the books during his last six months in office. The president used his signature to approve two GOP-sponsored bills that largely restore the power of states and school districts to set their own policy and practices for teaching and learning. The first bill rolls back the guidelines' measures on how schools should tackle violent situations and the second bill prohibits federal funds from being spent on so-called "sanctuary cities." "We're putting the local control back in the hands of the people of this country," Trump told school administrators and lawmakers as he signed the bills. "This is about fighting bureaucracy and fighting a bureaucracy that will dictate to you." The rushed rollout of the legislation, passed by a Republican-controlled Congress, was notable in itself, particularly because lawmakers received just a few days notice that the president was going to sign the bills. Trump, who had talked about the National Emergency Declaration to build his border wall with Mexico in a Rose Garden ceremony, signed the bills as soon as he left the podium at the White House. And while the bills directly target Obama's influence, there was little consensus in the halls of Congress over the president's emergency declaration — which was a capstone of his rapid dismantling of the former president's legacy in office. Rep. Bill Huizenga, R-Michigan, a member of the Education and Labor Committee, said that Trump's emergency declaration was a misuse of the "huge power" of the executive branch. Sen. Lamar Alexander, R-Tennessee, said Trump's move "does not constitute a national emergency" because there are no threats
